Why Do You Want To Be A Nurse?

For as long as I can remember, I have been passionate about helping other people. When I was growing up, I was always eager to lend a listening ear or a helping hand to a friend in need, no matter what kind of problem they were facing. During high school, I was drawn to the biological sciences and developed a natural interest in the dynamic field of health, so I decided to become a Certified Nursing Assistant (CNA). For almost ten years, I worked as a CNA in a healthcare facility. From the very start, I loved my job. As a health professional, I was gratified to spend every day serving the needs of patients. However, after spending years as a CNA, I realized that I wanted to take on more responsibility so that I could make more of a difference in the lives of my patients. For this reason, I decided to become a Licensed Practical Nurse (LPN), and I completed an accredited program in 2015. For the past two years, I have been working at a nursing home and rehabilitation center. I have also been working as a visiting nurse for about six months. Because these have both been positive experiences for me, I am once again interested in taking on more responsibility by advancing to a position as an RN.

Having spent over a decade working in a nursing setting, I have developed a passion for nursing practice. I love having the opportunity to work closely with patients to help them achieve their health goals. While I believe I have been able to do so as an LPN, becoming a Registered Nurse (RN) would significantly expand my scope of practice. As an RN, I would be able to make an even more significant impact on the lives of my patients. This is consistent with my long-term professional objective of maximizing the effectiveness of my efforts to promote health and wellness, so I believe that becoming an RN is the appropriate next step for my career.

Therefore, I would love to have the chance to complete the LPN to RN bridge program.

I also want to become an RN because it would mean further advancing my expertise in the health sciences. I have always loved learning, and my recent experience taking classes to get my Associate of Science (A.S.) in General Studies has reminded me of the value of formal learning in a classroom setting. However, even though I have enjoyed the general education courses for my A.S., I am even more interested in nursing-focused courses that I can apply directly to my practice as a nurse. By completing the RN to LPN bridge program, I would have the chance to increase both my nursing knowledge and skills. This would empower me to achieve my ultimate professional goal of truly making a positive difference to support the health and wellness of my patients.
