Why Do You Want To Be A Nurse Practitioner

I want to be a nurse practitioner because I want to use my strengths and skills to make the most positive difference in the world, especially in the lives of some of the most vulnerable members of the society. As a child, I was fascinated by fictional superheroes who were a force of good in the. A visit to an ill aunt in the hospital made me realized one doesn't need to have super powers to make positive difference in others' lives. The dedication and sincere concern with which the nurses were treating their patients left an everlasting impact on me. It was clear to me during the visit that I had found my calling.

I have extensive academic and professional experiences in the field of nursing and I could not have chosen a more fitting profession when it comes to my strengths, skills, and personal values. I am now a Registered Nurse (RN) and over the last six years, I have worked in both the public and the private sector. During this time, I have looked after some of the most vulnerable members of the society such as elderly and injured veterans and nothing beats the feeling of bringing comfort to those going through some of the darkest moments of their lives. While my academic and professional track record speaks for my commitment to highest performance standards, there is always a room for improvement. These are some of the most exciting times in the field of nursing which has been going through significant transformation due to factors such as changing demographics and technological progress. As a professional nurse, my patients deserve nothing but the best care from me which is one of the major reasons why I have decided to advance my academic credentials.

My graduate nursing education philosophy is that all students should be taught that all patients deserve individual attention and respect. Nurses should not treat each patient in the same manner but instead try to know them better in order to determine the best care package. Patients may not only have different personalities but also different life circumstances, cultural background, and communication styles among other things. These individual factors will continue to become more important due to emerging demographic trends.

My graduate nursing education philosophy is also that all students should invest significant energy in developing their communication skills, especially listening skills. Nurses spend more time with patients than physicians and in addition, they are dealing more and more with other stakeholder groups such as organizational management. Thus, strong communication skills are important to ensure nurses perform their expanding roles efficiently.

My graduate nursing education philosophy is also that all nursing students should also acquire knowledge in other areas such as business as well as soft skills. Healthcare sector has been going through tremendous transformation and nurses are increasingly being called upon to provide value in other areas such as operating efficiency and leadership. Nurses with diverse skills set will have greater opportunities to participate in management affairs and eventually rise to formal leadership positions.
